SARDINES
Set the Pace
Speed Their Way to New Culinar

THERE'S something very intriguing about sardines. They speed through the waters as tiny fish of many varieties; they speed through multiple machines in processes which convert them from mere fish into canned sardines; and they speed the pace of many foods by finding ever new ways to enhance canapés, sandwiches and hors d'oeuvres. They have a dash-and-go that sets the pace for modern menus.

Ever eat sardines on crackers in a country store? Don't let anyone tell you they didn't taste good. They did. They tasted so good that people couldn't forget about them, and modern dietitians began to devise new ways to distinguish them. Sandwiches, of course—then came canapés, which are just one step beyond the ordinary sandwich, because they are hot, toasted and gaily decorated. For hors d'oeuvres assortments, they presented an ideal topping because of their midget size and their definitely savory taste.

And Now!

And now we have devised even better sardine dishes—curries, Newburgs and similar highly seasoned good foods. These are excellent entrées for your cold weather dinners, or main dishes for Sunday night suppers. Look into the whys and wherefores of these new sardine dishes, and make them your own.

Curried Sardines: Drain the oil from two 3½-ounce cans of sardines into a small skillet. Arrange the sardines in a shallow baking dish. Mix two teaspoons curry powder and two teaspoons cornstarch to a paste in six tablespoons hot water. Add six tablespoons cream, then add slowly to the hot oil, cooking until creamy. Pour over the sardines and heat to boiling in a hot oven. Serve with toast points. This ... sons as a main dish ... sons as an entrée.

Because of the refreshing relief it has brought them, thousands of men and women, who could afford much more expensive laxatives, use Black-Draught when needed. It is very economical, purely vegetable, highly effective. . . Mr. J.
